‘Kent House Knightsbridge,
is the last surviving townhouse
of its kind’

The History of Kent House

The first Kent House was built in 1790 and bears the name of Prince Edward, Duke of Kent, son of George III. With no legitimate heir to the throne, the Duke had to marry for reasons of state, and his daughter became Queen Victoria. A succession of distinguished statesmen and authors occupied Kent House until it was demolished in 1870.

Lady Louisa Ashburton was the first mistress of the second Kent House – the building that stands to this day. Later, Lady Noble, granddaughter of the pioneering railway engineer, Isambard Kingdom Brunel, transformed the first floor drawing rooms into a remarkable Salon.

Lady Noble left Kent House in 1940 when, like so many other London landmarks, the needs of war transcended the need for luxury living. In recent years Kent House has undergone a remarkable restoration plan – capturing the spirit and essence of the original design and recreating the classical elegance for which the building had always been justifiably renowned.

KENT HOUSE KNIGHTSBRIDGE, as it is now known, is now considered amongst the best of venues in central London and as the last surviving townhouse of its kind offers a rare opportunity.

KENT HOUSE KINGHTSBRIDGE offers a variety of rooms within the intimacy of a private house offering clients the opportunity to celebrate in a uniquely sophisticated and entertaining environment.

The two floors are joined by a majestic sweeping red staircase, often lit with lanterns and beautiful flowers on the leading leading out to a stunning high glass atrium ceiling.
